I don't care if you're short or tall, skinny or fat, office-worker, laborer, school-boy, or businessman, I must make a new virile he-man out of you, and also help you build "inner strength" that will give you the virile look that women admire and men envy. What I did for Andre Lepine, Jack Delinger, Ray Schaffer and other "Mr. America" winners — and thousands of weaklings — I can do for you! Yes, I can turn you into a Real He-Man

STEUBEN SERVED

The man seated at the table had only recently arrived in Paris. At his side was a large hound that had accompanied him from Germany. The man wore a well tailored uniform and was no longer in his youth. His full name was Baron Friedrich Wilhelm von Steuben. He was intent on what he was writing. For he was informing the French minister of war of his presence — also that he intended soon to leave for London where Lord Stanwich was waiting for him.

It certainly was a good thing for the struggling colonies that the Baron never made that trip to England. Instead he finally met the French minister of war, Count St. Germain. And from him he learned about what was happening on the other side of the Atlantic. Now since France and England were old rivals, anything France could do to help the colonies win their independence, would certainly weaken England.

The Marquis de Lafayette, arms and munitions, soldiers and other help had been sent to the aid of the fighting colonies. Count St. Germain pointed out one terrible weakness of the Continental Army. It lacked organization and military discipline. The individual soldier was exceedingly brave and an excellent shot. Baron von Steuben had seen service as a captain on Frederick the Great's staff during the Seven Years' War. He had mastered the elements of the Prussian military system, considered the best in Europe at that time. Why was he out of work?

According to one version it would seem he got into a duel and was resting and relaxing in another country. The clever Count St. Germain contacted Benjamin Franklin, who was acting as representative of the American Congress in Paris. He told Franklin all about him and heaped a lot of praise on the head of the Baron. Also that the Baron had been Count Marshal to one of the German Princes. Franklin was deeply impressed by all of this. He also realized that von Steuben could perform a needed function in helping to make the American forces a more efficient fighting army.

However, there seemed to be some difficulty in the colonies because of jealousy that had developed between American officers and some of the foreign officers helping the army. With this in mind, Franklin felt he could not make any commitment. The Count told the sad news to the Baron and added a little advice: Remain in Paris for a few days more.

So Franklin met the Baron but made no promises. He would write back to Congress and to General Washington. He was certain that they would offer a position of high rank to von Steuben. The Baron wanted to be in the army again. He went back to Germany and waited for the letter offering him a position in the American army. He was impatient and returned to Paris.

Here the clever Count St. Germain decided to take things into his own hand. He gave the Baron money to make the trip to the colonies. He also suggested that von Steuben purchase a General's uniform, for Franklin had written in his letter that von Steuben was a Major General. And so he left, accompanied by his favorite hound, his german servant, and two French officers who would act as adjutants for him.

Accepting Steuben at first only as a volunteer without rank, General Washington sent him to inspect the camp at Valley Forge. The Baron was appalled at what he saw. Different drill manuals and methods, British, French and Prussian and different forms of organization were in use in the various state lines. All units were understrength. Some regiments stronger than brigades. Some companies stronger than regiments. There was general neglect of weapons and insufficient knowledge of their use in battle. Yet the discerning eye of the Baron recognized in the men who had endured the rigors of Valley Forge the best of soldier material. Indeed, he thought, no European army could have held together under such hardships.

Impressed with the Baron's judgment, General Washington made him temporary Inspector General, a new staff office, and instructed him to work out a standard training program for the Continental Army. Von Steuben began to write out his drill lessons in French. Then had them translated into English by his own and General Washington's aides.

He then organized a model company and personally undertook to drill these men in the movements he was introducing. When he had progressed far enough with the model company, he extended the drill to the entire army. Keeping the model company about six lessons ahead. Subordinate inspector generals were appointed for each brigade. To meet the problem of understrength, the Baron formed provisional battalions at full strength, and rotated surplus officers and non commissioned officers in the work of drilling; thus forming a cadre able to train the new recruits with whom it was hoped the ranks would be filled in the spring.

In this manner, Steuben taught the army to march in regular columns of twos and fours in uniform step. To fire volleys at regular command. To change from column into line and line into column with precision. And to use the bayonet effectively. Though he used the Prussian model, he adapted it to the characteristics of the American soldiers, eliminating all but the most essential maneuvers and motions.

Form and ceremony was subordinated to the interests of practicality. Recognizing the importance of skirmishers in America, Steuben took the lead in organizing elite companies of light infantry as a part of every American regiment. He was also a pioneer in impressing on officers their obligations to the men they commanded. American officers, following British traditions, tended to regard their responsibility as only that of leading their men in battle.

Steuben, by drilling the men himself and by paying attention to their sufferings and wants at Valley Forge, taught by example that the officer's responsibility extended to every phase of army activity. Steuben was quick to recognize that the American soldier had to be told why he should do things before he would do them well. And he applied this philosophy in his training program. His good humor and the way he used his newly learned English, delighted the soldiers. They were able to take the rigorous drill and discipline that he taught.

Thus, ironically, a Prussian whose traditions would seem to have been most alien to the American scene, first adapted the discipline and method of Europe to the ingrained individualism of the American soldiers. Pleased with Steuben's work, General Washington secured his formal appointment as Inspector General.

And in this post Steuben extended his work to other parts of the army.

The standard drill regulations developed at Valley Forge were formally codified in "Regulations for the Order and Discipline of the Troops of the United States," the so-called Blue Book. For many years to come this was to be the official training manual of the American Army. And its influence is still alive in the United States Army of the present day.

Steuben was certainly a hard worker. And he was quick to spot any weakness in organization and discipline in the army. Take the questions relating to rifles: Steuben discovered that when a soldier lost his rifle, there wasn't anybody around to discover why it had happened, nor to punish the soldier for his carelessness. The soldier received a new rifle. But there was no responsibility developed in the soldier in regard to caring for the weapon. At the end of a year the enlistment of a soldier would be up. He would bid farewell to his comrades and go home — with the rifle. But the rifle wasn't his! And thus Congress had to search to get the money to purchase thousands of new rifles each year.

Steuben changed all this. He made the soldier responsible for the care and possession of the rifle. It was the property of the United States. And when the soldier left, he had to return the weapon. All that was a matter of organization. He set up a system to control the weapons, the uniforms, the munitions and other supplies needed and used by the army.

He just couldn't stand anything that looked like laxity or carelessness. If a special mission had to be accomplished, he discovered sometimes twenty or thirty soldiers were sent out — when it could have been efficiently accomplished by two soldiers. So he worked out in details orders for missions and for furloughs. Steuben was an excellent horseman. And the soldiers as well as the officers would enjoy watching him ride across the field.

He gave five years of his life to the young American army. But money was something always short — in Congress as well as in the pockets of Steuben. He liked to live well and entertained his friends. He did receive large grants of land from the states of Pennsylvania and New York.

I have seen the stone on his grave. Here is what is written:

"He was Washington's principal military adviser and assistant in making the American Army, though ill-supplied and depleted in strength, a formidable and effective force.

His services were thus indispensable to the achievement of American independence."
